PRESS RELEASE

Slow Down for the Summer

U.S. Ambassador notes that over 200 children have died on Macedonia's roads because of speeding drivers

At an event marking the opening of a U.S.-supported pedestrian sidewalk project, the U.S. Ambassador to Macedonia urged drivers to slow down.

"Two hundred young lives have been lost, leaving behind 200 families who will never recover from the shock of losing a child. All because someone was in a hurry to get somewhere," said Ambassador Gillian Milovanovic, referring to the fact that 200 Macedonian children have been killed by speeding drivers since 1993.

The Ambassador went on to point out that, of the 200 children who have been killed, half were pedestrians, and that children are far more likely than adults to be killed as they are walking along the road rather than when they are riding in a car.

She congratulated the community of Petrovec, including Mayor Zvonko Cvetkovski, and the school board of Koco Racin Elementary School for taking positive action to improve traffic safety. "You are a model for other communities," said the Ambassador. "You have proven that you care about the children of this community."

The Petrovec sidewalk project was financed, in part, by the Municipal Good Governance Fund (MGGF) of USAID's Decentralization Project, which is designed to support Macedonian municipalities as they face the challenges associated with the decentralization process. USAID is part of the U.S. Mission in Macedonia. The project was a joint effort of the mayor, community groups and the school board of Koco Racin Elementary School. The sidewalk will provide a safe walking area along R103 in Rzanicino Village, an area that has been the scene of pedestrian traffic fatalities in the past.
